Historical Background

The Colorado River Commission (CRC) of Nevada began as an informal commission appointed by Governor Emmett Boyle in 1920. The purpose of this early commission, formally named the Colorado River Development Commission (CRDC) in 1921, was to safeguard Nevada's interests in ongoing negotiations over water and power rights pertaining to the Colorado River. This commission operated between 1921 and 1935, actively participating in the development of the Colorado River Compact of 1922 and the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928.

In 1935, the Nevada Legislature created the Colorado River Commission of Nevada to take the place of the CRDC. The legislature assigned the CRC the task of securing and protecting Nevada's rights and interests in the waters of the Colorado River, as well as in the electric power generated by the river. The Nevada legislature expanded the power of the CRC over the next fifty years, allowing the organization to negotiate and procure federal property and enter into agreements regarding interstate and international water transfers, Colorado River augmentation, and the operation of federal dams and other facilities along the river.

The CRC began working with the Bureau of Reclamation in 1956 on the Colorado River Storage Project and in 1960 on the Southern Nevada Water Project, which consisted of the future Robert B. Griffith Water Project and the Alfred Merritt Smith Water Treatment Facility. The CRC was also instrumental in several power projects, including the Parker-Davis Project, the Boulder Canyon Project, and the Glen Canyon Dam, all of which now provide electricity to Nevada.

Between 1931 and 2000, the CRC was engaged in ongoing legal battles pertaining to water rights and access in the Arizona v. California litigation, much of which pertained to land and water usage rights for several Southwest Native American nations and various states. The CRC is still in operation today and continues to work with state and federal entities to ensure water and power rights for the state of Nevada.
